Various additive polymers have been described in the prior art for incorporation into antiperspirant compositions to increase the mechanical properties of the film formed therewith. Recently, attention has been directed toward improving antiperspirant film formability by use of selected heat-stabilized polymers which are prepared by polymerizing in the presence of volatile solvents. The most commonly used class of polymers are high molecular weight polymers which are commercially available and include polyvinyl alcohol, polyvinylpyrrolidone, and the like. Although these polymers are relatively effective in improving the processability of antiperspirant compositions, they have the disadvantage of typically imparting to the antiperspirant compositions a certain degree of stiffness or rigidity. Other commercially available polymers include copolymers such as copolymers of anhydrous ethanol and ethylene oxide. These copolymers have the advantage of being easily fabricated to have a wide range of melt viscosity. The effectiveness of these polymers in improving the processability of antiperspirant compositions has, however, been limited by their inadequate ability to impart to the antiperspirant compositions an additional degree of softness. An object of the present invention is to provide polymeric materials which are especially suitable for use in improving the processability of antiperspirant compositions, particularly in the fabrication of soft antiperspirant films.
